ceived his commission, Julian Fairfax, who was busy studying for his degree. He did not join the company when it was first formed because he adhered to the Union until the Act of Secession was passed, hoping for a peaceful settlement. But "When Virginia went out, I went out too," he said.

Upon the return of his company to Charlottesville, Dr. Hullihen left the university and joined the Richmond Howitzers. In this company several young men from Wheeling were enrolled, among them his friends, the Houston brothers, two of whom later served as ministers of the Presbyterian church, one as a missionary in China. With the Howitzers he participated in the first battle of the war at Big Bethel.

Twice Wounded

Subsequently, the young soldier was promoted to a lieutenancy in a Louisiana regiment. He then made application to the war department of the Confederate states for a transfer to the cavalry. Having secured a transfer, he served on the staff of General "Jeb" Stuart for nearly two years. Later, he was transferred successively to the staffs of General Lomax and General William Payne. After the battle of Sharpsburg, he was proposed "for gallantry." He took part in the famous Pennsylvania raid before Gettysburg, and was twice wounded, the first time on the evening of the first day of the battle of Chancellorsville, after which he was nursed for months in Richmond at the home of Dr. Wimmenpole, rector of historic St. Paul's church. The occasion of the second wound was the battle of Trevilian Brook, in Sheridan's raid, after which he lay in a hospital at Staunton, the present Virginia School for the Deaf and the Blind, for several weeks. He rejoined the army in time to take part in the closing campaign around Petersburg. His parole at Appomattox he always displayed proudly along with his commissions as lieutenant in the C. S. A.

Graduated in 1867

After the war, Capt. Hullihen returned to his mother's home in Wheeling. For a short time he was engaged in take refuge with relatives in Pittsburgh, the hostility of certain United States officers towards Confederates having been very pronounced.

Dr. Hullihen entered the Virginia Theological seminary at Alexandria in the fall of 1866. He was graduated in 1867, the faculty having divided from yearly work into two classes on account of the soldier students. His ordination followed immediately. The year of his graduation was spent in Bolivar, with the parishes of Funkstown and Chewhaun being under his charge. Ordained priest, he went to Louisville, Ky., where he remained in charge of St. Andrew's church for two years. Then he was rector of the Church of the Messiah in Baltimore. There he was assisted by the Rev. Thomas U. Dudley, afterwards bishop of Kentucky, for several months. In April, 1872, he assumed of the rectorship of Trinity church, which he served continuously and devotedly for 46 years until his retirement in June, 1918, when the present rector was called. Mr. Gravatt was with the army in France, however, and Dr. Hullihen continued to serve Trinity; even after he turned active direction of the school old church over to his young successor, he continued to participate to some extent in its activities. Trinity was always nearest and dearest to his heart.

The degree of doctor of divinity was conferred upon him by Hampden-Sidney college in June, 1912.

Knew Great Chieftains

Dr. Hullihen reminisced occasionally about his war experiences, which were probably as interesting as those of any man who participated in the Civil war, because his service as an officer on General Stuart's staff gave him an opportunity to see many of the great Confederate leaders at close range and to know them well. He wore a beautiful old 18 carat gold watch which went through the war with him, and he used often to remark:

"If this old watch could just talk, what wonderful tales it could tell. For it was within hearing distance many times of the greatest of the Confederate leaders."

"Did you ever attempt to write your reminiscences of Lee, Stuart, and Jackson," he was asked, "or to keep a diary?"

"I was too busy those days," he replied, "to think of keeping a diary," and one inferred that he had not been able in the time since to write of his experiences.

"It's a good thing you never were captured, or some Yank surely would have taken that watch," Dr. Hullihen was told.

"Oh, but I was captured—but I wasn't a prisoner long enough for any one to get it," he remarked. Pressed to tell of the incident, he related it as follows:

Rode Into Enemy

"General Stuart had sent me with a message to General Jackson, and told me which road to take to rejoin the staff. After delivering the message, I started back to find the staff, and came upon a battery of artillery which had just taken part in an action with the Federals. It was unlimbered right in the road. I asked the officer in command, a big, ruddy fellow, if he had seen Stuart's staff. He answered 'No,' in a disgruntled way, and I rode on down the road, as I had been told by the General, that it was the one to follow. It was night. Suddenly I was challenged:

"'Halt! Who is there?'

"'An officer of Stuart's staff,' I replied.

"I was told to advance, and being fatigued and not on the alert, I didn't realize that I had ridden into a Federal picket, at first. But suddenly I realized that I was in the enemy's lines. The squad that was waiting me was not 15 yards off. I dug my spurs into my horse. He responded instantly, and as I wheeled him, the whole picket started to fire. It sounded like the whole Yankee army to me. A bullet hit me in the right shoulder, and the range was so short and the force so strong that it nearly knocked me out of my saddle. I was crouching forward, or it would have hit me in the neck or head, I expect.

"I rode right back into the artillery battery that had failed to warn me the Federals were ahead. They were in pandemonium, thinking the enemy was on them. I rode on, and a short distance away found the staff, and had my wound dressed."

Incident of Jackson

Dr. Hullihen confirmed the impressions of Generals Lee, Jackson, and Stuart that have been given by many writers. He told one incident that illustrates the character of Jackson:

"I had just been commissioned," he related, "and was still wearing a private's uniform when General Stuart sent me with a message to General Jackson. General Jackson gave me a written message to General Stuart to deliver on my return. He thought I was a courier. You know, the difference between a courier and a staff officer was that a courier carried only written messages, while a staff officer delivered messages verbally, so that, if he were captured, the enemy would be able to burn nothing.

"He was standing at stern attention, gazing me full in the eyes, as he gave me instructions about the message. Some officer of high rank came rushing up, and in his excitement, attempted to interrupt. Jackson paid no attention to him whatever, but without removing his eyes from mine, continued his instructions. When he had completed, he turned to the officer, but not before

Had To Get Uniform

"When I delivered the message to Stuart, he remarked, with a smile:

"'General Jackson thought you were a courier, didn't he? Well, you will have to get busy and get an officer's uniform.'

"He wasn't nearly as anxious for me to have an officer's uniform as I was to get it. But it was no easy matter, with an army in the field, to secure a uniform from Richmond. It finally caught up with me, though, and I was as proud as anything. It was the same uniform that I wore on Lee-Jackson day last January."

Oh that day, Dr. Hullihen delivered a very beautiful prayer at the Lee-Jackson celebration of Stonewall Jackson camp. The prayer was published in full at the request of his comrades.

His War Record

Dr. Hullihen's war record, as taken from the books of Stonewall Jackson camp, follows:

"Entered service in the Southern Guards, University of Virginia, April 18, 1861, to Harpers Ferry.

"Enlisted May, 1861, in Second company, Richmond Howitzers, at Yorktown, Va., July, 1862, by war department as Confederate States cadet, with rank and pay as 2d Lieut. (Provisional Army C. S.) and was assigned to staff of General J. E. B. Stuart (Cavalry Corps) commissioned as capt., adjutant general's department (Provisional Army C. S.) Nov. 19, 1862. He was assigned February, 1864, to Lomax brigade, afterwards Payne's, as inspector H. A. G. department. Commissioned as 2d Lieutenant, Army Confederate States (Regular Army) December 10, 1865, and served until April 9, 1865. Residence Staunton, Va. Occupation, clergyman. Place of birth, Wheeling, W. Va."

Dr. Hullihen took a great interest in military activities, and followed the World war closely. After the war, he seemed to enjoy talking over the Civil and World wars with veterans of the latter, and making comparisons in armaments, methods, tactics, etc.

Kept Interest In Church

For a long time after his retirement as rector of Trinity, he assisted in services on Communion Sundays and special feast days, his relations with the present rector, the Rev. John J. Gravatt Jr., having been most cordial. The younger man was devoted to his venerable predecessor, and never lost an opportunity to honor Dr. Hullihen's force for the church which he served so long and faithfully and in the services of which he seemed to glory in participating in. Not until recent months, when his physician forbade further active work because of heart trouble, did he retire altogether from the chancel, and then he continued to be a faithful attendant at church services. He resigned the diocesan council at Roanoke last May, and was the oldest minister there, but there were many clergymen present who had known and loved him for years, and he had the joy of a last reunion with these old friends, though never by spoken word or even intimation did he indicate any belief that it was a final one.

Dr. Hullihen loved the out-of-doors, and due had some big game hunts in Canada with his son, and some great fishing trips of which he talked most interestingly. He loved to mingle with people, too, and even when his health became bad, he took every opportunity to come into town from his home in the suburbs to greet his friends. Visitation of the sick was a duty which he never neglected, and he continued to call upon those of his parish and others, too, who were confined to their homes, even after he became very feeble. His long and faithful service to Trinity, his lovable disposition, and his many acts of kindness will keep his memory ever in Staunton long after the last tribute is paid at his grave.
